A method for simulating the distribution of cultured cells in a microenvironment. Determining how cultured cells respond to their microenvironment is an important goal of tissue engineering. Although a number of experiments have used microenvironments to test the responses of cultured cells, we have been unable to reproduce the results using current experimental techniques. The purpose of this work is to describe a model system for studying cell-microenvironment interactions. First, we describe a technique for cell seeding that ensures consistent spatial arrangement of the cells. The technique has been used to demonstrate cell-microenvironment interactions in an array of perfusion chambers, and it was successfully used to show that cultured cells from a human amniotic membrane spread better on a microenvironment containing a "bath" of fibronectin than on a microenvironment that does not contain a bath of fibronectin. Second, we describe a method for measuring the mass transfer coefficient, $K(f)$, from the acellular microenvironment to the cell layer. A combination of simulated moving bed and centrifugal liquid/liquid separations was used to achieve equilibrium between the acellular perfusion solution and the cell layer. Cell viability was measured using a trypan blue exclusion technique. The $K(f)$ from the perfusion chamber to the cell layer was measured at different levels of protein concentration in the perfusion solution. Cell viability was not affected by protein concentration in the perfusion solution. The measured $K(f)$ value was determined from the concentration of protein in the cell layer as compared with that in the perfusion solution.
